

Brown abroad, selling us into slavery

Greens leader Bob Brown has taken his crusade for a world parliament to Senegal, for the Global Greens conference of green parties. The draft resolution:

Greens recognize that the need to strengthen democracy and participation in the system of global governance has become urgent...

The Global Greens Congress reaffirms its support of the creation of a United Nations Parliamentary Assembly (UNPA) as a parliamentary body within the UN system that is complementary to the UN General Assembly. As a first step it should be composed of representatives of national parliaments but ultimately it should become a body that is directly elected by the world's citizens.

As representation of the world's citizens, we believe that a UNPA, among other things, should be involved in all important intergovernmental treaty negotiations.

This would be a parliament in which Australia was always outvoted on matters affecting its sovereignty. It would surrender our freedom to a foreign governing body we could never dismiss or sanction.

The Global Greens also want to scrap the coal industry:

Greens in coal producing nations (China, US, India, Australia, Indonesia, Russia, South Africa, Germany, Poland, Kazakhstan, Colombia and Turkey) and coal consuming nations (Japan, South Korea) agree to work together on a campaign to phase out the production and use of coal.

This is a resolution drafted by the Global Greens Coordination, on which sits an Australian Greens representative.

So how does that resolution sit with Bob Brown's denial:

I'm not going to shut the mining industry down, Chris. You're sounding like a Liberal propagandist. I've never said that, and nor would we.
